NYC Faces in MOTION

New York is a city on the move. Every day an average 3.4 million riders take the subway to destinations in the five boroughs and connections beyond. Come to artist Clare Stokolosa's exhibit to experience the journey.

She expands her NYC Faces subway series of portraits to make the paintings come alive in an immersive experience.

Videos of Clare's series, NYC Faces, transport the viewer. Pastel drawings of objects from the paintings, paired with sounds from the urban environment, expand the body of work.

Clare brings these objects to the forefront by drawing on newsprint containing references connected to each item. Headphones with dangling wires drawn on an advertisement for apps in the New York Times reflect her painting Deep in Thought.

She continues to work on this series of objects in progress: a prayer book and hat from the painting Praying on the A Train, the dog's bow from Woman With Dog, the hoop earrings from Chit Chatting With Friends, and the baseball cap in I Left My Phone at Home.

Come and join Clare for an immersive experience!

Meet the Artist

I explore the essence of urban life in my paintings, depicting people in their travels, sharing the public space. My paintings consist of large black ink drawings painted in watercolor, a linear style which I developed working on a series called NYC Faces; an anthropological study of people moving through life — from New York City's subways to other public spaces.

In the series, NYC Faces, I observed how people inhabit a private world in a public space. I document their interactions both inward and outward. Whether focusing on objects, pets, books, newspapers, cell phones, or just deep in thought each has a unique expression of concentration. I saw the NYC subway as a crossroads and conduit of diverse people, living in harmony. In my own travels, I made the decision to stay off my cell phone, and sketch riders on my daily commute.

I developed a multi-step process. By scanning the original images into larger dimensions using an ink jet printer, I preserve the spontaneity of the original line. The line drawings are printed on high-quality watercolor paper. In my studio, I paint the enlarged images. I focus on light and value, using watercolor to get a translucent quality. I decided to work in a bright color palette to create positive, uplifting imagery.

Among the painting titles that reflect my theme are Deep in Thought, Looking Out the Window, and Woman with Dog. To expand the series, I include bridges and bicycles, iconic symbols of traveling together.

My objective is to share the paintings with as diverse a group of people as those in the paintings and start a conversation. This effort is progressing. The work has been displayed at galleries in New York neighborhoods, from Long Island City to Washington Heights, to Williamsburg and on more than 1,700 ArtOnLink Kiosks throughout the five boroughs.

This series continues to grow as I explore different forms and multimedia.

I invite you to come to the exhibit and enjoy!

Review

Clare Stokolosa is an astute observer of the passing scene, visually writing stories about strangers on the train or Tuscan landscapes. She does these sympathetically, with honesty and a discerning eye. Her new works are large and demand attention, then ask the viewer to supply a narrative – stories that extend past the rectangle's boundary and into the viewer's world.

Clare's recent series, New York City Faces, began simply with her sketches of other riders on the subway. When expanded to larger than life dimensions, these sketchy drawings became forceful, lively and complete, with added watercolor washes defining shapes like stained glass objects: a brown bag, a red shirt or a green book.

Both line and color look spontaneous and are complimentary — sharp clear lines contrasting with expressively brushed watercolor. Paintings made for her Italian Landscape Series were similarly begun as sketches then painted with watercolor, giving each a whimsical atmospheric effect.

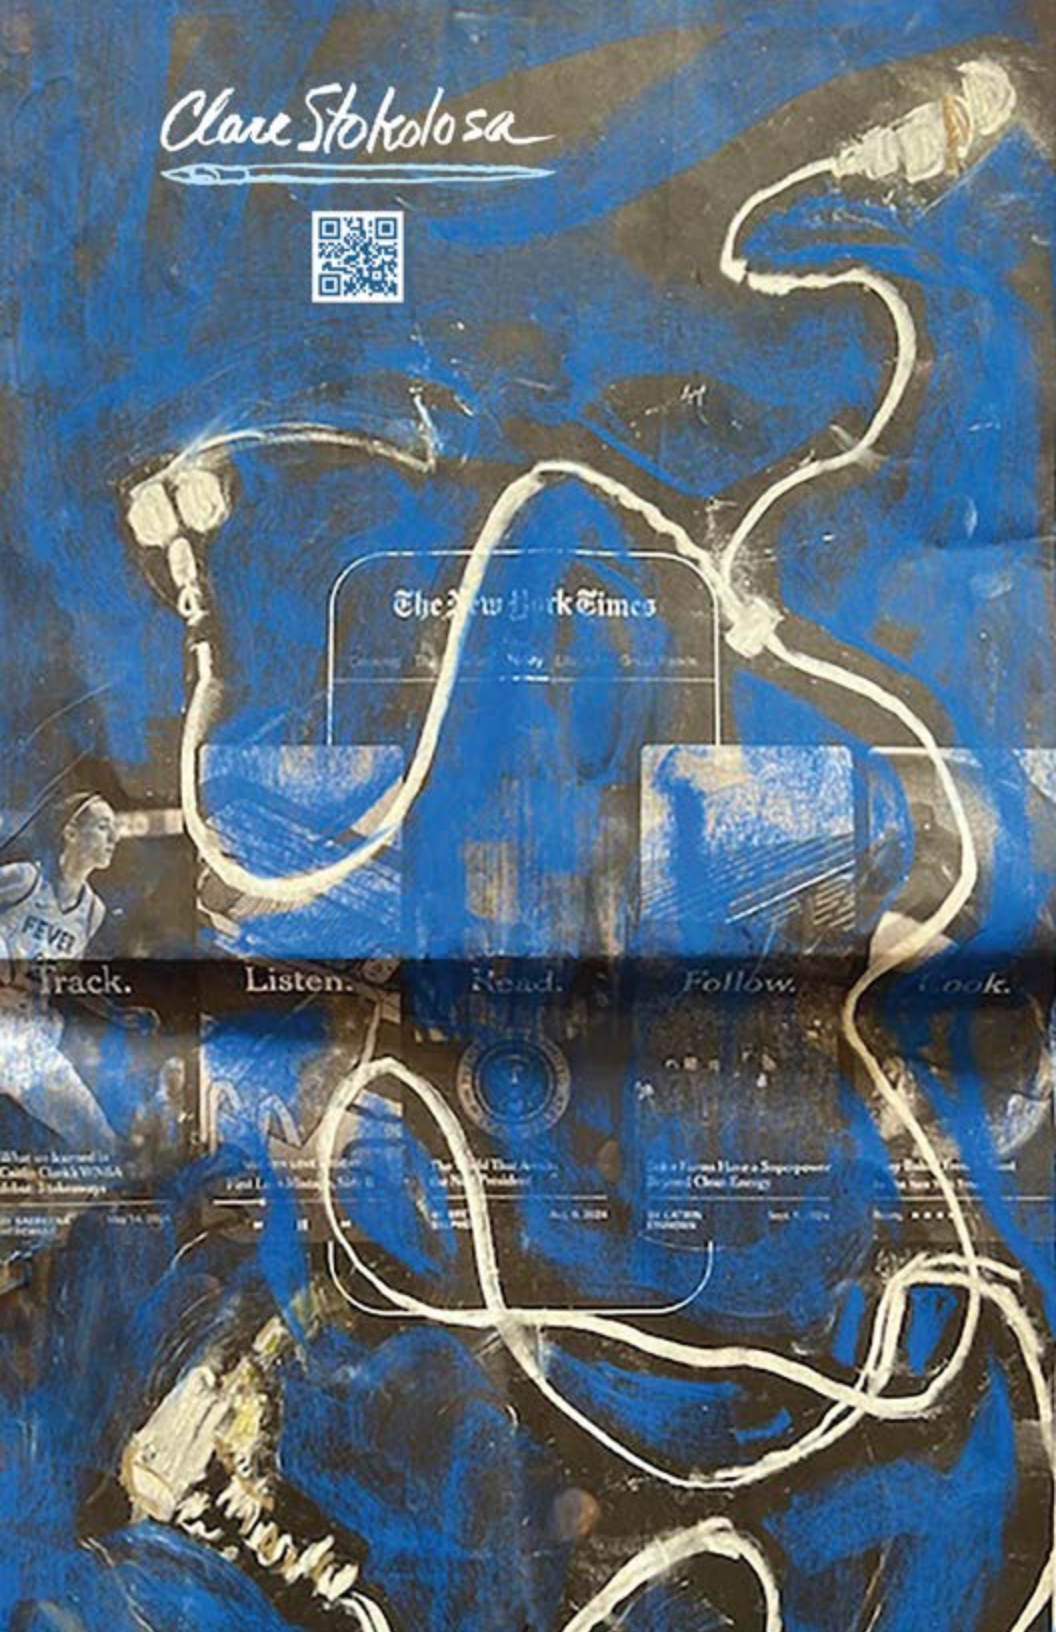

Looking at Clare's work, I was reminded of two great artists. Her characters are reminiscent of Daumier's lithographs, but instead of his bristling critique of the social and political elite, Stokolosa's paintings are sympathetic to all. They show everyday people doing everyday things: talking animatedly, lying on a train or reading a book. They are caricatures in the best sense of the word.

Another artist who comes to mind is Chagall. Where Chagall told stories from his Russian Jewish roots, Clare Stokolosa draws inspiration from her Italian heritage and Astoria childhood. Her work shows a familiarity with New Yorkers, but also the Italian villages she visits each year, and a love of both.

Clare Stokolosa is a romantic realist, painting the prose of the street – poetically.
